Western argumentation theories were not introduced to China until the twentieth century and argumentation studies in modern Chinese universities were not revived until the 1990s with a heavy influence of Western epistemologies, especially pragma-dialectics and informal logic. In recent years, a new domain of argumentation studies has emerged in China as English speech and debate education has flourished in Chinese universities over the past two to three decades. With the goal of showing how practical pedagogy has shaped the development of argumentation studies in contemporary China, this essay focuses on how Western theories are applied in the emerging domain of English speech and debate. A synoptic review of the three different stages of English forensic education in China is provided with a brief discussion of its implications for further development of Chinese contemporary argumentation theories.
